Dear Greg,

The issue of residential street numbering is a major problem for emergency services in country areas. People are, in a large number of cases, unwilling to part with 'lot numbers' even though there are cases where there are up to three identical lot numbers in the same street. Those that do choose to use the correct house/street number often do not display them in a prominent position which, when time is of the essence – as in an emergency, the delay in identifying the correct address may mean the difference between life and death. Methods of displaying the correct number vary from tiny brass numbers on a letter box to hand painted numbers on a fence post, again causing possible delays at night due to the issue of visibility of the identifying address number. Reflective numbers, issued free by the Council and placed in a predominate position near the front gate are quite visible at night, however the illuminated numbering system you demonstrated to me last Monday at our station, especially when fitted to rural properties, would make identification of the correct address so much quicker and easier due to the high visibility of the numbers.

Congratulations on the idea and the product and I wish you success in the marketing of it in our area as it will greatly assist the Police, Ambulance and ourselves in the rapid identification of addresses during an emergency.

Yours Sincerely,
